The club members set out on a search and rescue mission, and they soon find the baby otter. The otter is scared and alone, but the club members are able to calm it down and take it back to their clubhouse.

At the clubhouse, the club members give the baby otter a warm bath and some food. They also make a bed for it in a cozy corner of the clubhouse.

Over the next few days, the club members take turns caring for the baby otter. They feed it, play with it, and make sure it's getting plenty of rest.

As the baby otter gets stronger, the club members start to think about how they can reunite it with its family. They know that the otter's family is probably looking for it, and they want to do everything they can to help.

The club members come up with a plan to release the baby otter back into the wild. They choose a spot near where the otter was found, and they make sure that there is plenty of food and water nearby.

On the day of the release, the club members gather at the spot where they plan to release the otter. They're all excited to see the otter go back to its family.

The club members place the otter on the ground, and they watch as it takes its first steps back into the wild. The otter is a little scared at first, but it soon starts to explore its surroundings.

The club members watch as the otter swims in the river, plays with other otters, and eats some fish. They're so happy that they were able to help the otter reunite with its family.
